

Nicholas Iannuzzi is a fellowship-trained hand surgeon, who serves as an Associate Professor at the University of Washington. He grew up in North Carolina. His father was an Emergency Medicine physician and his mother was a nurse. His brother is also an Emergency Medicine physician, so medicine is considered the family business. Nick attended Princeton for undergraduate studies, completing a comparative literature degree with focuses on medieval studies and Spanish language. He received his medical degree at UNC Chapel Hill and traveled to Seattle to complete an orthopaedic surgery residency at the University of Washington. After completing his hand fellowship at the Curtis National Hand Center in Baltimore, he returned to the University of Washington and the VA Puget Sound to begin practice. He currently serves as the chief of Orthopaedic Surgery at the VA Puget Sound and an Associate Professor and Associate Program Director in the Department of Orthopaedic Surgery and Sports Medicine. He lives just north of Seattle with his partner and two miniature schnauzers.
